How to write a composition-reasoning

Let's start with the definitions of what "reasoning" is:

inference, a number of thoughts presented in a logically consistent form ("Dictionary of the Engish language" Ozhegova SI);

one of the three elements of the composition, defined as the development of thought in a certain pattern; the evidence-based development of some abstract position to the extent of its obvious clarity (Literary Encyclopedia);

functional-semantic type of speech, performing a specific communicative task to give speech an argumentative character (to come to a new proposition in a logical way or to argue earlier) and made out using lexical and grammatical means of cause-effect semantics ("The Stylistic Encyclopedic Dictionary of the ").

So, reasoning is thoughts set out in accordance with logic, supported by evidence, connected by a chain of arguments and developing into convincing conclusions.

Reasoning reveals and describes the causes and the relationship of any phenomena. At its beginning, as a rule, a thesis is placed a statement, the truth of which must be proved with the help of arguments, weighty and convincing arguments. An essay can be based both on reasoning-statements (the truth of the put forward thesis is proved), and on reasoning-refutation (the falsity of the put forward basic position is proved). The writer is given the opportunity to use not only direct facts, but sometimes evidence from the contrary. Building evidence, the author of the essay can rely on personal experience, newspaper and magazine publications, films, give examples from life and literature.

Before starting work on an essay, you need to clearly articulate a thought that needs to be proved. Then, based on the statement requiring argumentation, a plan for future creative work is drawn up.

Scheme of essay-reasoning

- 1. Introduction.
- 2. Thesis.

3. Arguments: arguments, evidence, explanations, justifications; examples, cases, facts, figures; opinions of authoritative people, statements, quotes 4. Conclusion.

The introduction to the essay-reasoning is a short introduction to the topic. It can be formulated as a question or contain a quote. The thesis put forward will be the starting point for further reasoning, and most of the composition will be argumentation at least 2/3 of the total volume of the text. It is believed that the optimal number of arguments for essay-reasoning is three.

The arguments may be:

- historical facts;
- statistical data;
- episodes, storylines of literary works, confirming the idea being proved;
- proverbs and sayings, aphorisms;
- opinions of authoritative people The most convincing, in your opinion, argument is best placed last.

Arguments can be made to prove one's position using the following words and phrases:

- Let us turn to (fact, memories of someone, scientific data It is enough to give such an example This can be proved as follows The following fact can serve as confirmation of what was said I will give one more example proving my point of view This is easy to verify by contacting For instance...
